Since 2012 citizens have been asked to collect mosquitoes in their private surroundings, kill them by freezing and send them to the research institutions involved (Leibniz Centre for Agricultural Landscape Research or Friedrich-Loeffler-Institut). In our labs we identify the mailed in mosquitos morphologically or genetically and inform the 'mosquito hunters' on the species they sent and provide them with the major biological facts on the collected mosquito.

Hence, more than 20,000 entries from the "Mückenatlas" (mosquito atlas) alone went into the German wide Culicidae database CULBASE that also form the basis of my thesis. I will analyse the complete dataset applying a big data approach from a biological and citizen science perspective as well as comparing the passive surveillance data with my own systematic monitoring results on the mosquito fauna in Berlin.
